This project aims to harness rainwater by creating reservoirs and using it for agriculture, which has turned this area into a producer of sugarcane since the Republican era. After some distance, we will reach Chocope, where we will take a left turn to reach the peaceful town of Magdalena de Cao, a place known for its artisans and producers of the famous Niña del Año. Passing this town, we will arrive at the El Brujo Archaeological Complex, open to the public since 2006, where we will visit the Cao Museum, inaugurated in 2009. It is a modern building that displays objects found in this area. The museum has thematic rooms with videos explaining the activities carried out by the Moche people. We will then visit the archaeological site that remains standing thanks to conservation efforts. Once the visit is complete, we will return along the same route we took from Chocope and continue our journey for approximately 2 and a half hours along the Pan-American North Highway, passing through the sugarcane fields of the Casa Grande and Paiján sugar empire.
